The link to our local club has passed down to my grandfather and father attending games at the manor, with my father attending his last ever game at the Kassam via an ambulance from sobel house in his last days. My daughter is also now a 5th generation season ticket holder and my son attending his first games this season. The thought of a near 100 year connection to the club dying out in a couple of years makes me feel extremely sad. But the football club is so much more than just a link to the people who regularly attend. It's a source of income to those employed, it's a revenue generator to the local economy, and it's far reaching community work through the club it's self and its charity far out weigh any of that. 10's of thousands of peoples lives are made better each year through having a professional football club. Oxfordshire is also one of the most affluent counties, with some of the worse sporting facilities. The club isn't looking to build a pre fab box, but a state of the art, carbon neutral venue that will be up there with the best in the country. The arguments against are based on preconceptions of football hooligans, poor traffic management and scaremongering. Please look at the bigger picture, it really is so much more than " vendetta's="" what="" who=""/> <input type="text" value="Thankyou for your time"/>
