Comments	If you must continue removing our green spaces and replacing them with ugly buildings, at the very least you should consider the local people who cannot afford to get on to the housing ladder. Rather than giving the land and building rights over to money hungry developers who make a token gesture to social housing, it would make better sense to build homes that are actually within the reach of those on lower incomes. Many local workers cannot afford the price of homes in this area and are forced to either rent or move from the area they have grown up in. The old style council estates were not always pretty but they did give people starting out the opportunity to rent at a reasonable price and not be subjected to private landlords who are only in it for the money and, in many cases, have scant regard for basic living conditions. The continual addition of industrial spaces is good for the local economy only if local people can afford to live and work in the area, basic social economics!
