The preservation of countryside for arable land for food production should be a national priority. Taking land out of food production, or that could be used for food production, is disastrous at any time, but more so when there is a world problem. Antnio Guterres, the United Nations Secretary-General, warned on May 18th that the coming months threaten " war="" warming="" we="" well="" will="" years="" years.=""/>2. The RSPB has reported that one in ten UK species of animals is already at risk of extinction and over half of UK wildlife is in decline. Taking out even more farmland, hedgerows, and established trees just to concrete over with warehousing, and pander to over-consumption and profligate importing is plainly irresponsible. Environmental emergencies have clearly been ignored in the decision-making.So climate crisis, the food crisis, and the wildlife crisis should prompt planners to change tack and think about providing what the country really needs."/> |
